Anna Moore of Colchester Archaeological Group then gave a really fascinating talk about Bures Cropmarks which the group have been studying since 2011. Their book, The Stour Valley: A Prehistoric Landscape is available from Nayland PO price £5. Anna began by stating that Cropmarks indicate what was going on under the soil in pre-historic times whereas Crop circles are made by tractors in fields of growing crops. In about 8,500BC the ice started to melt from the last glaciation and hunter-gatherers started visiting The Stour Valley, which is wide and shallow with the river running through. In ancient times the river was more of a highway than a barrier as it is now and there have been several changes in its course. Evidence of an older course running further south at Wormingford shows in aerial photos. The oldest man-made feature is a longbarrow, which shows as a pair of parallel ditches dating to 4,000 BC with lines of post holes on 1 side. Although the acid soil has destroyed most organic matter, it is thought it was used to lay out bodies, which were left to decay. The Bures cursus, or ceremonial way, is 190 metres long; another cursus at Wormingford is aligned with the sunrise and sunset at the solstices. From about 2,000 BC, smaller circular mounds were used for burying the dead in cremation urns which were usually inverted i.e. to return the bodies to the ground. Anna also commented on Wormingford Mere, a significant piece of water called a kettle hole, left from the last ice age. Pre-historic people considered water to be the entrance into the underworld and this could be the reason that this part of the Stour valley was much used for rituals. Anna finished by showing some aerial photographs of the valley.

Martin Wright gave the Vote of Thanks, referring to the change in the landscape by nature and man – with mystical elements of the Solstice
